Translation Notes

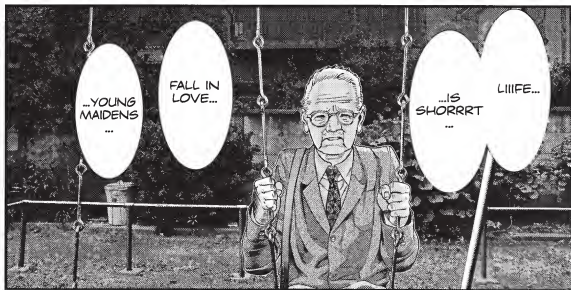

Royal Host, page 12

A Japanese restaurant chain of the type commonly called famiresu, or “family restaurant.” As the name suggests, these are family-oriented restaurants that feature reasonably-priced food, a wide variety on the menu, and a comfortable environment.

Zaru-soba, page 13

A cheap, traditional form of soba buckwheat noodles, in which they are served chilled and drained with a small cup of strong broth for dipping. Zaru-soba gets its name because it is classically served on top of a zaru, which is a round, flat sieve made of tiny bamboo slats.

Fall in love, young maidens, page 40

The lyrics to a 1915 song called “Gondola no Uta” (Gondola Song) about the brief nature of life and the quick passage of time. It was memorably sung in Akira Kurosawa’s film Ikiru by the main character as he sat on a swingset during a snowy night, reflecting on his life and imminent death by stomach cancer.

The Big Issue, page 109

A street newspaper founded in England, with several local publications in various countries around the world. The paper is produced by professional journalists and sold by the homeless, thus helping them earn a living and reintegrate into society.

Karaage-kun, page 116

A type of rounded chicken nugget sold at the major convenience store chain Lawson’s. They are recognizable for the distinctive “pocket” container with the Karaage-kun chicken mascot’s face on the outside.

Fireworks names

The fireworks the teenagers are using in this scene are not real products, so they have particularly ridiculous names. Starting from the right, there's: "Launch All You Like 99" which probably has 99 shots in it. Following this in the middle panel is "Hidden Treasure: Natto Fireworks" which resembles a roll of fermented bean sushi commonly found in Japanese convenience stores. In the right panel, the title is partially obscured but it seems to be a crude play on words that translates to something like "FAP FAP, 70 shots."

Kancolle, page 166

The nickname for Kantai Collection, a mobile game franchise that revolves around real life battleships personified by cute girl characters. It exploded in popularity shortly after the game began, eventually spawning all manner of media spinoffs—manga, anime, merchandise, etc.

DQN, page 169

A Japanese net slang term (pronounced "dokyun") that refers to anyone who is childishly antisocial, self-obsessed or lacking in common sense.

2chan, page 172

One of the oldest and largest ongoing Internet message boards in Japan. Its fully anonymous posting system was the basis for later copycat site 4chan, and the numerous subtopic boards covering just about any subject imaginable are similar in scale to Reddit.

Chokko, page 189

A nickname based on an alternate reading of the kanji that make up the character's name. When read as a proper name, they would be pronounced "Naoyuki," but when read using the on-yomi (Chinese-derived) method, it becomes chokkô, which means "direct," as in a direct flight or train.
